

Given the FCC’s responsibility under the Paperwork Reduction Act (PRA) to minimize the paperwork burden on respondents, the Bureau appropriately inquired about the “utility and rationale for each of its existing data collections” and how to “reduce production burdens.” Notice at 1-2. The Bureau also sought comment on “additional data” that could inform FCC policy making, and ways it could improve data collection and analysis processes. Id. at 2.

II. The FCC’s Paperwork Reduction Act Obligations

Any inquiry about government data collection necessarily starts with the PRA. Prior to the adoption or revision of a collection of information, the PRA requires federal agencies to review each information collection and solicit public comment in order to evaluate whether the proposed collection is “necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the agency” and to “minimize the burden of the collection” on respondents.³ The PRA also requires agencies to certify that each collection of information, inter alia, (i) is “necessary” and “has practical utility”; (ii) is “not unnecessarily duplicative” of information otherwise accessible to the agency; (iii) to the extent practicable, reduces burdens on information providers, including by using information technology; and (iv) uses “plain, coherent, and unambiguous terminology and is understandable” to respondents.⁴ The Commission must consider the comments in this proceeding in light of these clear requirements for reducing burdens on information providers and ensuring that government data collections are necessary.

³ 44 U.S.C. § 3506(c)(1)(A), (c)(2)(A). The purposes of the PRA, as set forth in 44 U.S.C. § 3501, focus on reduction of information collection burdens. See 44 U.S.C. § 3501(1), (3), (10).

⁴ 44 U.S.C. § 3506(c)(3)(A), (B), (C), (D), (J).

III. Issues Raised by Commenters

Despite the requirements of the PRA, some data-gathering proposals submitted in the record fail to explain how the data requests are necessary, relevant to the proper performance of the functions of the FCC, or even related to any lawful regulatory purpose. For example, Professor Danilo Yanich requests that the FCC make available various “proprietary datasets,” including data compiled by BIA Financial, Television & Cable Factbook and Nielsen Media Research,⁵ claiming that this data is needed because “knowing the socio-demographic, economic and media system information of the DMAs is crucial to making judgments about the content of newscasts.”⁶ As an initial matter, the Commission lacks authority to appropriate the proprietary business information of private entities and make such information available for the convenience of private researchers. The Commission, moreover, has no proper regulatory role in making qualitative and/or content-based analyses about stations’ newscasts, and, indeed, could not do so consistent with the First Amendment.⁷ If Professor Yanich or other researchers are interested in analyzing the content of news, they are free to purchase data from private entities that gather and publish such data and use it for whatever academic purpose they choose.⁸

New America Foundation (NAF) also appears interested in having the FCC gather information for purposes that are not clearly connected to any particular regulatory activity.⁹ For example, NAF urges the FCC to construct and maintain for analysis a Diversity Index (or Community Information Needs Index). The Commission previously developed a Diversity Index for a very specific purpose – to guide the FCC’s decision making in its statutorily required periodic review of the broadcast ownership rules.¹⁰ Although NAF identifies a variety of research topics that theoretically could be addressed through the data included in such an index, it does not specifically explain the regulatory purpose for which this data would be relevant.¹¹

NAF’s proposal should be rejected, as no agency, consistent with the PRA, can collect information simply for its own sake. Gathering and maintaining data that may or

⁹ See Comments of NAF in MB Docket No. 10-103 (Aug. 13, 2010) at 5-11.

¹⁰ See 2002 Biennial Regulatory Review, Report and Order and Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, 18 FCC Rcd 13620 (2003). The cross-ownership rules developed using this Diversity Index were remanded to the agency in Prometheus Radio Project v. FCC, 373 F.3d 372 (3rd Cir. 2004), and the FCC has not utilized this Index in its subsequent reviews of the ownership rules.

¹¹ Indeed, NAF observes that the long-term importance of an index such as the FCC’s Diversity Index, “may not be in its continued application to policy questions.” Comments of NAF in MB Docket No. 10-103 (Aug. 13, 2010) at 9 (internal citations omitted).

may not be relevant to the development of any FCC rule or policy directly contravenes the PRA requirement that an information collection be “necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the agency” and be of “practical utility.”¹² Information collected without a clear and appropriate regulatory purpose is also, by definition, an unnecessary burden on respondents. Finally, to the extent that some parties’ comments raise substantive issues,¹³ such substantive matters are clearly beyond the scope of this limited data practices proceeding and should not be considered here.

IV. Improving the Efficacy and PRA Compliance of Broadcast Ownership Reports

In 2009, the Commission adopted an order substantially modifying its broadcast ownership reporting requirements.¹⁴ The Commission directed the Media Bureau to appropriately modify FCC Form 323, the Form’s instructions, and related aspects of the Consolidated Database System (CDBS) for electronic filing of the Form. Radio and television broadcast licensees were required to file ownership reports on the revised Form 323 by July 8, 2010.

NAB and broadcasters appreciate the Commission’s efforts to improve the quality and accessibility of data regarding minority and female owners, as well as the efforts of FCC staff to make technical and other improvements to the Form prior to the July 8 filing deadline. Based on NAB's inquiries with member broadcasters and their counsel, who now have practical experience with filing the revised Form 323, the Commission should consider further improvements prior to the next filing cycle. Below, NAB has provided examples of improvements to the Form that will allow the FCC to meet its intended goals, while reducing unnecessary burdens and duplicative collections inconsistent with the FCC's obligations under the PRA. While additional modifications may be needed, improving these aspects of the filing requirements and instructions will provide needed clarity and reduce the time, effort and cost associated with completing the Form, including for many small entities.¹⁵

A. Suggested Improvements for Form 323:

Issue: Because Form 323 does not allow cross-referencing to information on other reports, extensive ownership information on parent and intermediate companies' forms must be repetitively filed on reports for each of the licensees in which they hold an attributable interest. The inability to cross-reference reports for entities holding interests in multiple licensees results in unnecessary complications, redundancies, and preparation time, particularly where there are complex ownership structures. Significantly, complex ownership structures are very common, even for entities that own only a single station or a small number of stations.

Proposed modifications: Modify the electronic version of Form 323 in CDBS to allow for cross-referencing. NAB anticipates that this can be done in a manner that allows ownership information to remain searchable.

- An entity with several wholly-owned licensee subsidiaries should be able to list all of the licensees (and their respective stations) in Section I, Item 7. This would greatly reduce the number of reports that are identical in every respect except for the response to Section I, Item 7.¹⁶

- Similarly, the FCC should consider whether Section II-B, Item 3(c) can be eliminated as duplicative. Respondents should not be required to identify stations licensed to other entities within a broadcast group in responding to this question. Interests in those stations will be disclosed in the ownership reports filed for the common parent entity. Because of the requirement to identify interest holders in Item 3(a) by FCC Registration Number (FRN), the identities of these interest holders are already verifiable. At the same time, responding to Item 3(c) is among the most burdensome aspects of completing the form.

B. Suggested Improvements for Form 323 Instructions:

Issue: Although the PRA explicitly requires that each collection of information be “understandable to those who are to respond,”¹⁷ certain aspects of the filing instructions for Form 323 are confusing and not discernible. In some instances, conflicting information is presented in the instructions. Where the instructions are unclear, filers may unknowingly take varied approaches in responding to questions, thereby undermining the FCC’s goal of capturing uniform information.

Proposed modifications: Improve the instructions to ensure clarity and consistency. For example:

1. Clarify Instructions for Section II-B, Item 1. On page 6 of the instructions, under Section II-B, Item 1, Contracts, the second column includes a paragraph that states:

Only Licensees and entities with a majority interest in or that otherwise exercise de facto control over a Licensee must respond to this question. All non-Licensee Respondents should select “Not Applicable” in response to this question.

The second sentence contradicts the first for non-licensee respondents that have majority interests in or exercise de facto control of a licensee. It is possible that varied interpretations were used by respondents. Improvements to the instructions will improve the consistency of the responses to Form 323.

2. Clarify Instructions for Section II-B, Item 3(a). Instructions for reporting Equity Debt Plus (EDP) interests caused countless hours of unnecessary work for many filers. Under the FCC’s EDP rule, an interest holder whose interests are normally not attributable is considered attributable under certain circumstances.¹⁸ The instructions the voting interest). The use of family trusts is very prevalent among small broadcasters, and the requirement to file a separate Form 323 for each family trust greatly and needlessly increases the number of reports that must be filed.

¹⁸ See 47 CFR 73.3555 Note 2(i).

(Section II-B, Item 3(a)), however, were not clear about whether EDP calculations should be performed when the EDP rule is not triggered. While FCC staff gave informal advice in telephone conferences that parties with already attributable interests should insert a "0" for the EDP field if EDP was not triggered, filers would be unaware of this unless they contacted staff for further guidance. As a result, many filers performed very time-consuming calculations and reported unnecessary information for all reporting parties. We suggest that the instructions be reworked to clarify that this information is not required where the EDP rule is not triggered.

3. Clarify Instructions for Section II-B, Item 3(c). Page 9 of the instructions directs respondents to "[l]ist any broadcast stations . . . in which the Respondent has an attributable interest." Yet, Item 3(c) asks whether "the Respondent or any person/entity with an attributable interest in the Respondent also holds an attributable interest in any other broadcast station." This discrepancy caused some confusion regarding the persons/entities who should be reported in Item 3(c), and respondents took a variety of approaches. It is unclear whether indirect or direct interests should be disclosed in Item 3(c). The instructions should be clarified.

These suggested changes would make the Form 323 more easily understandable and would help reduce burdens on respondents without reducing the utility of the information provided. Indeed, in many instances, the changes would improve the accuracy and uniformity of licensees' responses. Broadcast licensees' recent experiences with preparing and filing the revised Form 323 show that the above-described changes are warranted.¹⁹ It is NAB's understanding that, for example: a station group owner that filed eight or nine ownership reports previously had to file 61 reports in July 2008; one television station group was required to file 300 reports; the licensee of a single low power TV station had to file seven separate reports; and a low power TV group had to file approximately 130 reports, with attendant substantial legal costs. We were made aware that a medium-sized company spent 80 hours and in excess of $50,000 on legal/consulting costs to complete its reports. The significant burdens imposed by, and duplicative and unclear data requests associated with, the revised Form demonstrate the need for making the minor changes proposed above, consistent with the FCC's PRA obligations.

V. Conclusion

In light of broadcast licensees' recent experiences in submitting the revised FCC Form 323 for the first time, NAB requests that the Commission reexamine the broadcast ownership report, with a view to clarifying instructions, reducing duplicative information and minimizing the burden on respondents, especially small entities. We further urge the Commission to evaluate the necessity and utility of the data requests made by certain commenters in this proceeding, and otherwise review its existing information collections, in light of the terms and purposes of the PRA.
